Life in Almaty

Adaptation

Kazakhstan might still be seen as a rather unusual expatriate destination; there are few online resources or guide books to help prospective expats prepare for their new life. Newcomers to KIMEP are recommended to get advice on interested questions from current students or International Relations. Below we present some essential matters to know about.

Language barrier in Kazakhstan

While Russian is acknowledged as the ‘language of business’ and used in the workplace in Kazakhstan there has been a push to increase the use of Kazakh and to re-introduce lost traditions in the country. A few words of Kazakh will be highly appreciated by the locals. Most companies that employ non-natives are multinational companies with English-speaking managers. Still, living in Kazakhstan would be a more pleasant and enriching experience learning the Kazakh or Russian language. Kazakh is using Latin and Russian is using Cyrillic alphabets.

ENGLISH	RUSSIAN	KAZAKH
Good morning!	Dobroye utro!	Qayirly Tan [Ka-ihr-ly Tan]

Hospitality in Kazakhstan

New arrivals should not be surprised if they get invited to the home on a Kazakh they've recently met. If invited for a meal it is polite to bring a small gift for the hosts and to try a bit of every food offered. If offering flowers to a host, never bring an even number of flowers. At any gathering almost everyone will be expected to make a toast. Expats invited to a function will not be expected to make their toast in Russian or Kazakh, the simple act of making the toast is usually enough. However, if you know in advance that a toast will be required it is worth getting a local to teach you a short sentence or phrase in one of the local languages. The extra effort will always be noticed and appreciated.

Food in Kazakhstan

The traditional Kazakh diet is heavily meat based. Vegetable intake, especially greens, is often deficient. The Kazakh national dish is called Beshbarmak, known as “five fingers” because it is traditionally eaten with your hands, is made of lamb or mutton, noodles, and onions. Horse meat is very popular. While Kazakhs are not very religious, most of them do not eat pork. Be aware of this if you are dining out with Kazakhs or planning a dinner at home. Other popular foods reflect the presence of various ethnic groups (136!) that have left their mark on Kazakh culture and include Uzbek plov (fried rice and meat), Russian pelmeny (dumplings), Dungan lugman (Chinese type of noodles with meat and veggi), and Uighur manty (dumplings filled with ground meat, onion, pumpkin). Korean dishes are common, particularly salads, due to the influence of Korean immigrants. If you're a vegetarian, you're probably thinking there's nothing for you in Kazakhstan. However, there are many cafes offering veggi meal.

Weather

The temperature range in summer, particularly in the south of the country, is sharply continental (+35° Celcius daytime, +20° Celcius nighttime). Whereas, in mountains it might be only +10° Celcius in nighttime. Rains might happen unexpectedly and be heavy, but they are warm and last shortly. Winter is mild, though could be cold (-25°) and snowy, especially in January.

Religion and race in Kazakhstan

Kazakhstan is a secular state, home to people of many different ethnicities. Kazakhs are proud of the diversity of their population and the country strives to promote peace between religions worldwide. There is freedom of worship but expatriates should not proselytize. The majority of the population (about 70 percent) are Muslim with the second largest religious grouping being Orthodox Christian. Alcohol is freely available, pork is also available, but in many places halal meat is offered. Furthermore, pork products are always kept separate from the other meat products. Most Kazakhstanis will enjoy a drink or, if not, will not object to your drinking.

Basic Kazakh etiquettes

Etiquette and cultural norms related to acceptable and unacceptable behavior vary between urban and rural Kazakhs. As a rule, rural Kazakhs tend to follow the cultural norms more strictly. Kazakh men always shake hands with someone they know when they see each other for the first time in a day. Both Kazakhs and non-Kazakhs remove their shoes when inside a house. Guests always remove their shoes at the door. In Kazakh culture, elder women and men are greeted with certain phrases showing respect. A Russian system of patronymics is still widely used. Public affection between friends is very common. Women and girls often hold hands as they walk; boys wrestle and often hook arms or walk with their arms around each other. Kissing cheeks and embracing is perfectly acceptable between good friends.
